THE CLOUD OF UNKNOWNING

Chapter

- 1 Of the four degrees of the Christian life; of the development of his vocation for whom this book was written. 45
- 2 A short exhortation to humility and to the work of contemplation. 46
- 3 How the work of contemplation shall be done; of its excellence over all other works. 48
- 4 Of the simplicity of contemplation; that it may not be acquired through knowledge or imagination. 49
- 5 That during contemplative prayer all created things and their works must be buried beneath the cloud of forgetting. 53
- 6 A short explanation of contemplation in the form of a dialogue. 54
- 7 How a person should conduct himself during prayer with regard to all thoughts, especially those arising from curiosity and natural intelligence. 55
- 8 A good exposition of certain doubts that may arise concerning contemplation; that a man's curiosity, learning, and natural intelligence must be abandoned in this work; of the distinction between the degrees and parts of the active and contemplative life. 57

- 9 That the most sublime thoughts are more hindrance than help during the time of contemplative prayer. 60
- 10 How a man shall know when his thoughts are sinful; of the difference between mortal and venial sins. 61
- 11 That a man should strictly appraise his thoughts and inclinations and avoid a careless attitude about venial sin. 63
- 12 That in contemplation sin is destroyed and every kind of goodness is nourished. 63
- 13 Of the nature of humility; when it is perfect and when it is imperfect. 65
- 14 That in this life imperfect humility must precede perfect humility. 66
- 15 A proof that those who think the most perfect motive for humility is the realization of man's wretchedness are in error. 68
- 16 That a sinner truly converted and called to contemplation comes to perfection most quickly through contemplation; that it is the surest way to obtain God's forgiveness from sin. 69
- 17 That a true contemplative will not meddle in the active life nor in what goes on about him, not even to defend himself against those who criticize him. 71
- 18 How to this day active people will criticize contemplatives through ignorance, even as Martha criticized Mary. 72
- 19 A brief apology by the author in which he teaches that contemplatives should excuse active people who complain about them. 73
- 20 That in a spiritual way Almighty God will defend all those who for love of him will not abandon their contemplation to defend themselves. 74

- 21 A true explanation of the Gospel passage: Mary has chosen the best part. 75
- 22 Of the wonderful love Christ had for Mary Magdalene, who represents all sinners truly converted and called to contemplation. 77
- 23 That in a spiritual way God will answer and provide for all those who will not leave their contemplation to answer and provide for themselves. 78
- 24 What charity is in itself; how it is subtly and perfectly contained in contemplative love. 80
- 25 That in the time of contemplative prayer, the perfect contemplative does not focus his attention on any person in particular. 81
- 26 That without special grace or a long fidelity to ordinary grace, contemplative prayer is very difficult; that this work is possible only with grace, for it is the work of God. 83
- 27 Who ought to engage in the gracious work of contemplation. 84
- 28 That a man should not presume to begin contemplation until he has purified his conscience of all particular sin according to the law of the Church. 85
- 29 That a man should patiently persevere at the work of contemplation, willingly bear its sufferings, and judge no one else. 86
- 30 Who has the right to judge and censure the faults of others. 87
- 31 How the beginners in contemplation should conduct themselves in regard to their thoughts and inclinations to sin. 87
- 32 Of two spiritual devices helpful to beginners in contemplation. 88

- 33 That through contemplation a person is purified of particular sins and their consequences, yet never arrives at perfect security in this life. 89
- 34 That God gives the gift of contemplation freely and without recourse to methods; that methods alone can never induce it. 90
- 35 Of Reading, Thinking, and Prayer, three habits which the beginner in contemplation should develop. 92
- 36 Of the kind of meditations common to contemplatives. 94
- 37 Of the kind of personal prayers common to contemplatives. 95
- 38 How and why a short prayer pierces the heavens. 96
- 39 How the advanced contemplative prays; what prayer is; and what words are most suited to the nature of contemplative prayer. 97
- 40 That during contemplation a person leaves aside all meditations on the nature of virtue and vice. 99
- 41 That in everything except contemplation a person ought to be moderate. 100
- 42 That by having no moderation in contemplation a man will arrive at perfect moderation in everything else. 101
- 43 That a man must lose the radical self-centered awareness of his own being if he will reach the heights of contemplation in this life. 102
- 44 How a person shall dispose himself so as to destroy the radical self-centered awareness of his being. 103
- 45 A good exposition of certain snares that may befall the contemplative. 105
- 46 A helpful instruction on the avoidance of these snares; that in contemplation one should rely more on joyful enthusiasm than sheer brute force. 106

- 47 How one grows to the refinement of purity of spirit; how a contemplative manifests his desire to God in one way and to men in another. 107
- 48 That God desires to be served by a man in body and soul; that he will glorify both; and how to distinguish between good and evil spiritual delights. 109
- 49 That the essence of all perfection is a good will; sensible consolations are not essential to perfection in this life. 111
- 50 What is meant by pure love; that some people experience little sensible consolation while others experience a great deal. 112
- 51 That men should be careful not to interpret literally what is meant spiritually, in particular the words "in" and "up." 113
- 52 How some presumptuous young beginners misinterpret "in"; the snares that result. 114
- 53 Of the various inappropriate mannerisms indulged in by pseudo-contemplatives. 115
- 54 That contemplation graces a man with wisdom and poise and makes him attractive in body and spirit. 117
- 55 That those who condemn sin with indiscreet zeal are deceived. 119
- 56 That those who rely more on their own natural intelligence and human learning than on the common doctrine and guidance of the Church are deceived. 120
- 57 How some presumptuous young beginners misunderstand the word "up"; the snares that follow. 121
- 58 That certain instances in the lives of St. Martin and St. Stephen are not to be taken as literal examples of straining upward during prayer. 123

- 59 That Christ's bodily ascension shall not be taken to prove that men should strain their minds upward during prayer; that time, place, and the body should be forgotten in contemplation. 125
- 60 That the loftiest and surest way to heaven is measured by desires and not by miles. 126
- 61 That in the right order of nature the flesh is subject to the spirit and not the reverse. 127
- 62 How a man may know when his spiritual work is beneath him, outside him, on a par with him, interior to him, and when it is above him but beneath God. 129
- 63 Of the spirit's faculties in general; how the mind as a principal power comprehends in itself all the other faculties and their works. 130
- 64 Of the other two principal powers, Reason and Will; how they functioned before original sin. 131
- 65 Of the first secondary power, the Imagination; how it functions and how original sin has harmed it. 132
- 66 Of the other secondary power, Feeling; how it functions and how original sin has harmed it. 133
- 67 That ignorance of the spirit's working powers may easily lead to error in misunderstanding instruction about contemplation; how a person is made almost divine through grace. 134
- 68 That nowhere spatially is everywhere spiritually; that our superficial self will ridicule contemplation as a waste of time. 135
- 69 How a man's love is wonderfully transformed in the interior experience of this nothingness and nowhere. 137
- 70 That as we begin to understand the spiritual where our sense-knowledge ends, so we most easily come to the highest understanding of God possible in this life with

- the help of grace, where our spiritual knowledge ends. 138
- 71 That some people experience the perfection of contemplation in rare moments of ecstasy called ravishing, while others experience it as they will amid their ordinary daily routine. 140
- 72 That a contemplative should not take his own experience as the criteria for other contemplatives. 141
- 73 That the Ark of the Covenant is a figure of contemplation; that Moses, Bezaleel, and Aaron and their dealings with the Ark represent three contemplative paths. 142
- 74 That anyone disposed toward contemplation will recognize something akin to his own spirit when he reads this book and that only such a person should be allowed to read or hear this book; the admonitions of the Foreword are repeated. 143
- 75 Of certain signs by which a man may determine whether or not God is drawing him to contemplation. 144
